“You treat a disease, an illness or an injury – you lose. But if you treat the person, you’ll come out ahead - even against the odds”

The human body has an amazing ability to heal itself, if given the right opportunity. The right opportunity is what Frank Mutoka, MS, PT - director of rehabilitation, creates. He pulls out all the stops to generate an efficient healing environment that produces physical and emotional well-being for his patients.

He spends much of his day building and supporting a team of impressive therapists. But that’s only a partial picture of Mutoka. Graduating from Free University of Brussels with the highest honors allowed him a bevy of post-graduate work. He chose to practice in the United States.

He’s a well-travelled man. He speaks 4 languages, holds two diverse upper-graduate degrees in physical therapy and business, and likes sports that move; namely tennis and martial arts. He’s fast to learn and slow to offend.

He learned those lessons at an earlier time. It started with himself being a patient. A car accident left him with painful injuries to his back and neck. He says that his own therapy started the process that compelled him to conquer his physical ailments and left a mark on how a patient should be treated.

His beliefs taught him to be choosy about his career path and gave him a desire to align with only those employers who give to patient need and those who see the patient as an individual. He also believes that patients should have access to the highest standards in therapy services and equipment that are geared specifically for the injured population.

On a personal level, he’s driven by an internal core of values given by his parents. His father set the bar and was highly distinguished in Brussels, Belgium as a holder of four university degrees and a professor at two universities. Mutoka’s heritage didn’t allow him to fall far from the tree.

He’s been on the fast track ever since and everywhere he goes, he’s been tapped by senior management to build and lead rehabilitation teams.
